The question is not similar to any of these: Gentoo to Ubuntu A: Remember this: "If it ain't broke, don't fix it." "You'd have to come back to Gentoo to find out" You can't just "take a backup" of your system and copy it to a new system. For starters, your old system is packaged in such a way that you can't just copy the dpkg package list. When you upgrade to a newer Ubuntu release, you'll only get the latest version of software if you do an installation. If you want to keep the older version, you'll have to back it up first. It's best to back it up on your local hard drive but that's often impractical. The best solution is to back it up in a format where the backups can be restored in the new system. Backup tools like rsync and tar work perfectly here. If the backup are created with compression, it is advisable to convert those before restoring them to the new system. A: First of all, I would recommend you to make a backup of your current Linux installation. If you do this in a safe manner, you should be able to restore the backup to another Linux system without much hassle. If you can't spare the time to do this step or simply just want to keep all your current software settings, I would recommend to move your current home folder to the new Ubuntu installation. You can restore these settings by using the "Users and Groups" tool. A: Adding to Matt's answer, I got most of my settings the way it was to work with Ubuntu with rsnaphot. Since it's a bit special, I will use a sample here: `$ cat /etc/rsnapshot.conf rsnaphot -v --keep-env my /home` Then, on a new installation, `$ rsnaphot --keep-env /home` The first command, on /etc/rsnapshot.conf line, will make a backup of your home folder. For more details, you can read the rsnaphot manual Wednesday f678ca9f9e
